CHRONIC MYELOID LEUKAEMIA-A Bird's Eye View

Introduction

eukaemia simply put is cancer of the white cells which are cellular components of blood. These abnormal white cells accumulate in bone marrow and also infiltrate other organs such as liver, spleen, lymph node, coverings of brain, skin or testes.

Leukaemias can be classified as acute (aggressive) or chronic (indolent) and depending on the cell type involved can be myeloid or lymphoid. Types of leukaemia are thus Acute Lymphoblastic Leukaemia, Chronic Lymphocytic Leukaemia, Acute Myeloid Leukaemia and Chronic Myeloid Leukaemia.

Chronic Myeloid Leukaemia results from a translocation between chromosome 9 and 22 giving rise to the Philadelphia chromosome which accounts for the proliferation and accumulation of the leukaemic cells. It affects all ages including children.

Aetiology

The cause is unknown. However, a predisposing factor; high dose ionizing radiation has been associated with the disease.

Clinical Manifestations of CML

Most clients present with an enlarged spleen (95%). Other manifestations include enlarged liver, anaemia, weight loss, fatigue, night sweats, increased susceptibility to infections, hearing loss and priapism. Some clients are asymptomatic and are diagnosed only after a routine medical laboratory tests. The white cells will be markedly increased.

Laboratory Diagnosis:

Full Blood Count (FBC)

Peripheral Film Comment/Bone Marrow Aspirate Cytogenetics

Molecular Studies (PCR)

Treatment

Options available in our setting include tyrosine kinase inhibitors such as Glivec and hydroxyurea. Early diagnosis and treatment is key to the management of CML. A FBC and a peripheral film comment can definitely make a difference to someone's life. Let's make a difference.
